TEXT 1 - Questions 46 to 50

More on my favorite subject – celebrity worship

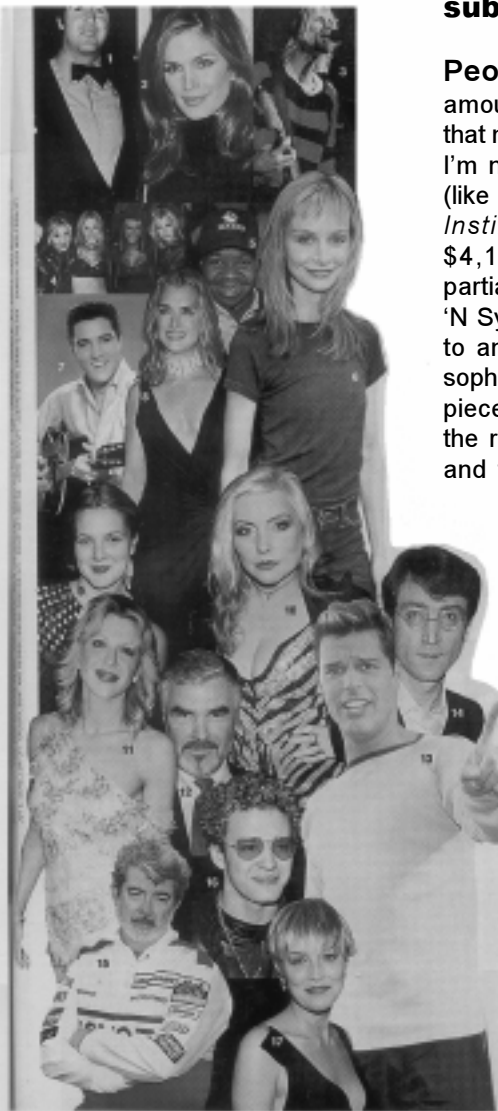

People are sick. They'll pay stupid amounts of money for just about anything that may have belonged to a celebrity. And I'm not talking about actual memorabilia (like Sharon Stone's ice pick from Basic Instinct, which, incidentally, sold for $4,125). Two slices of French toast partially eaten by Justin Timberlake of 'N Sync recently sold on eBay for $1,025 to an obsessed University of Wisconsin sophomore who said she "just wanted a piece of them." Justin had the toast at the radio station Z100 in New York City, and the DJ sold it. Even sadder, Drew Barrymore's estranged mother, Jaid, sold her daughter's baby clothes on www.gavelnet.com for $450. Elvis Presley's sheets went for $475.

Some film students stole George Lucas' employee-parking sign and auctioned it for $450.

Lip imprints from Ricky Martin, Cindy Crawford, Calista Flockhart and Brooke Shields made money for the American Foundation for AIDS Research. Hey, I have Michael Bergin's home phone number. Any takers?

PAIN ATTRACTION

Alternative doctors aren't the only ones drawn to magnets anymore, reports Kathryn Belgiorno.

As far as most devotees of conventional medicine are concerned, magnets have always seemed better suited to 5 refrigerators than to pulled muscles. Yet ever since magnets started popping up in everything from mattresses to insoles, it's become difficult to resist their pull – and now there's scientific evidence to add
10 weight to the claims that they can relieve pain. In a recent study, 20 patients recovering from liposuction used magnetic patches, which not only eased their discomfort but also aided the healing
15 process: They reported less swelling after four days and less bruising after three than those who didn't use magnets. Studies involving polio victims and people with chronic foot pain had similar 20 results. And pain may not be the only trouble magnets can treat. Research from the University of California at Los Angeles suggests they may help deliver chemotherapy drugs to tumor sites in 25 some cancer patients.

THE MOM REPORT

The State of the World's Mothers 2000 is a new report that's determined the status of motherhood around the globe – examining which components contribute to the well-being of women and children in 106 countries. Issued by the Save the Children organization, the report has recorded worldwide statistics on factors such as lifetime risk of maternal mortality, percentage of births attended by trained personnel, prevalence of contraceptive use, and literacy rates. Two elements made the greatest difference to a country's rank: female education and family planning. And national wealth alone did not guarantee the well-being of mothers.

The top ten countries that fared best for motherhood were Norway, Canada, Australia, Switzerland, United States, the Netherlands, United Kingdom, Finland, France, and Cyprus. Most surprising: Although the U.S. is one of the wealthiest countries in the world, we have one of the highest infant and maternal mortality rates among industrialized nations, in part because of the lack of national health insurance and disparities in the health status of minorities.
